John McDonough was appointed Director of the National Archives in December 2014.

Prior to his appointment, he worked as Head of Collections in the Library & Research Service of the Irish parliament supporting and delivering online research outputs and information services to Deputies.

He holds post graduate qualifications in Archival Studies and an MSc in ICT Systems.

John has previously worked as project manager of University College Dublin's Digital Library which developed a pilot repository infrastructure for digital humanities content, and in the Irish state Broadcaster where he established a digital repository for radio content.

John represents the National Archives on a number of national and international bodies and is also a member of the Irish Manuscripts Commission and the Council of National Cultural Institutions.

John McDonough